The first Sounds of Summer festival was held at Waterloo Park over three days.

According to historical data compiled by the board of directors, the festival has been held every year since 1983, when the city decided to hold a festival celebrating Canada's Centennial celebration at Waterloo Park.

A family event

The festival was created at Waterloo Park for a community purpose. In 1983, the event's name was changed to Sounds of Summer. The change was made to accommodate the festival's participation from more than just the City of Waterloo.

Despite the festival's financial success, the City of Waterloo retains the Sounds of Summer Music Festival in 1998.

For the next five years, the festival moved to Waterloo Park, where a section of King Street was closed off to accommodate a one-way street party.

Sound has and will be the key to the festival's success through sponsorship.

Due to budget and only regular hours, the event closed back to the park, where groups of people were sent to help with the festival.

For the first time, the Sounds of Summer Music Festival has moved to the west side of Waterloo Park.

Local volunteerism

An extension of the festival, the Sounds of Summer Music Festival was added this year to help the city get out, which is the goal of the festival.

The festival's success depends on the local volunteers who help with the festival. The festival's success depends on the local volunteers who help with the festival. The festival's success depends on the local volunteers who help with the festival.

Director of personnel Lorna Schweertzenstuber said, "The festival's success depends on the local volunteers who help with the festival. The festival's success depends on the local volunteers who help with the festival. The festival's success depends on the local volunteers who help with the festival."

presented by CBOB CTV, the local library and the City of Waterloo. Community partners presented with the festival were Rogers Cablecast, TV 9000, FSN, and a program.

"The event encourages youth, family and pretty much anyone who loves music to come out and celebrate the beginning of summer."

Volunteer work is key

What makes the festival come together are the 20 volunteers of the board of directors, who help with the festival. The festival's success depends on the local volunteers who help with the festival. The festival's success depends on the local volunteers who help with the festival.

The Warblers were among many artists, featured at the main stage of the Sounds of Summer festival at Waterloo Park on June 19. Other groups which performed at that stage were The Krazy's, Copyright, and Chantal Kornblum.
